

Recognizing Great Leaders

Do they follow
a common path?

Author Daniel W. Evans

If you are one of those who love the news networks you can agree that most of what we see and hear is very little good and plenty of the bad and ugly. Negativity and the worst of human traits are portrayed daily. The world needs its examples of leaders such as John C. Maxwell, Martin Luther King Jr., Zig Ziglar, Billy Graham and Ronald Reagan. What makes these examples stand out and recognized as world class leaders? There are three things that make individuals appear as giants in the crowd. These leader examples does not constitute an all-inclusive list.

As John C. Maxwell says, "Leadership is influence." Everyone influences either in a negative or positive way. More positive ways are what the world needs. Positive ways of influence offers peace, and unity, thus promoting growth individually and socially. There are some commonalities among these leaders to make them great. They follow certain principles while maintaining an attitude that strengthens their audience of followers.

Here are three things that will help you recognize great leaders all around you.

- They Possess Positive Attitudes
- They Follow Common Principles
- They Have the Ability to Maintain Great Followings